

Recently, I applied to the Wake Forest Investment Fund, and I received a first-round interview. However, I did not make it through to the second round of cuts. I thought I had prepared plenty for the interview and that it went well. I guess I could have done a better job answering the behavioral questions, but I thought even those went well. This reflection is not so much about thinking about what I could have done differently, but rather appreciating all the work I put into this application. While I'm disappointed it did not work out, I don't think I would have done anything differently to prepare. For this reason, I'm not frustrated with myself and honestly feel fine about the whole process. I reached out and asked if there was anything I could improve on interview-wise, but other than that, I don't believe there is much more I should be doing. I can continue to refine my skills, but I am proud of myself for putting all the work I did into this application, regardless of the outcome.
